The Civil Service Reform League Discusses it.

HARRISON'S BROKEN PROMISES

Enumerators Appointed for Political Pur

age system. The improvement produced by the elimination of partisanship from the census is shown in the comparatively satisfactory results and general confidence in the census of 1880. This was before the civil service law, but the essential element of political consideration in the appointment was largely observed.

Coming down to the present census, the reported says if the promise of the kepublican platform had any significance at all it in meant that the President would extend the competitive system to clerks of the census bureau when that bureau should be established. Mr. Harrison, in concurring with and adopting the pratform, distinctly made this promise his own. The well known opinions of Mr. Porter, who was solected by the President as superintendent of the census, made it certain that appointments would become, in a great measure, matters of political patronage. Porter's opposition to civil service methods "were creating a system of barnaclism." The act of March 1, 1889, divent the superintendent a suitable person, and with his consent, employ such persons as enumerators who shall be selected solely with reference to their litness and without reference to political patrol as completed the product is going to waste on account of insufficient tankage.

So far as the protection of refugees is concerned the practice of nations includes cases widely variant in principle. Our own history, however, shows where refugees seeking an asylum in a legation were not Americans, the United States government has uniformly discouraged their admission and protection; but the real issue in the present case appears to be an admission and protection; but the real issue in the present case appears to be an interference with the free communication between the legation in Santiago and the cutside world, and in such cases the provisions of the international law are most explicit. Broadly stated, the country to which a minister is accredited guarantees that in time of peace this communication shall not be interrupted, and that the servants and attractes of the legation are not to be molested, or any act done that may tend to impede the transaction of the business of the legation. The United States in particular has shown itself to be intolerant of any interference, and even in the France-Prussian war protested most ef-
